The military is claiming that the homes in the village, which comprise numerous improvised structures, were built without permission and that no master plan for the village is registered with the Civil Administration thus making all construction illegal. Furthermore, the military has stated that it is not possible to grant retro-active permission and legalization to the area despite many Israeli settlements and outposts receiving such leniency under the Israeli military occupation of the West Bank that is ongoing following the 6 Day War of 1967. • Israel Supreme Court judges granted a government request to postpone the eviction of the Migron outpost in the West Bank. In a statement, the court said the final date for the evacuation of Migron would be August 19, and not August 31, as was decided in an earlier postponement. In the end, under a further discussion, the last date for the eviction of the outpost was set as August 21. The state asked to delay the evacuation as it had been scheduled to take place during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, and there are worries that ‘price tag’ attacks against Palestinians over the eviction may take place at this time. 'Price tag' is the name of an often violent campaign by militant Jewish settlers and nationalists, aimed mostly at Palestinians and Israeli peace activists. When GOC Central Command Major General Nitzan Alon requested the postponement, he did not explain how it was possible that he only found out about the month of Ramadan in the past few days. The state also claims that the temporary site that Migron settlers are due to be transferred to be moved to. The High Court decision comes despite the recent criticism of High Court judge of the states conduct in the Migron case. Haaretz (July 27, 2012).

snipers occupied roof tops of some Palestinian buildings that over look the tomb. Settlers practiced religious rituals at the Tomb before withdrawing the area. Clashed erupted between Palestinians and the IOA as a result. Paltimes (July 1, 2012).

- For the past three months the Israel Defense Forces have prohibited farmers from the West Bank Palestinian village of Aqraba from reaching their farmland and seasonal homes in the area, on the grounds that they are in a live-fire range. However, Givat 777, an auxiliary outpost of the Itamar settlement, is located in the same firing range. The IDF declared the area a firing zone after 1967, but according to village residents, it hasn’t been used for training for about 20 years. When it was, the commanders would suspend the exercises for an hour or so to let the farmers get to their land. Five months ago, a number of settlers waited for a few of the villagers, who rode a tractor on the dirt road. When the farmers returned, having fled the scene upon encountering the settlers, they found the burned remains of the tractor. In early April there was an altercation with settlers armed with knives whom the villagers say ambushed them on the same road. The Palestinians were arrested and the IDF ordered the farmers not to use the path, on the grounds that it is in a firing zone. Since then, the villagers say, an Israeli man who pitched a tent on a hill that commands the path and the spring for the area uses the same path freely, even putting his flocks out to pasture on the wheat fields they planted six months ago and are not permitted to harvest. Haaretz (July 2, 2012).

Others

• The High Court of Justice granted the state’s request to postpone the demolition of five houses built on privately owned Palestinian land in the Ulpana neighborhood of Beit El settlement in the West Bank. Last May, the High Court ruled that the houses will be razed by July 1. The justices decided that the demolition will be postponed until mid-November. Last week, the state evacuated the residents of the houses to a nearby temporary base and requested an extension on the date of demolition, in order to dismantle the homes and move them elsewhere. Haaretz (July 1, 2012)

• After 45 years of running the West Bank, the State of Israel plans to start compiling land registry records of assets controlled by settlers. The registry would bypass regular tabu land-listing processes, and appears designed to prevent Palestinians from appealing the validity of the ownership listings. Documents obtained by Haaretz indicate that this land registry process comes as official policy whose "legal and diplomatic repercussions" have been reviewed by top officials. The registry process is supported by deputy attorney general Mike Blass, along with Defense Ministry legal adviser Ahaz Ben-Ari, Civil Administration head Brig. Gen. Moti Almoz and Defense Ministry settlement adviser Eitan Broshi. The registry process is expected to receive Defense Minister Ehud Barak’s approval later in the month. The need for such a land registry process grows out of Israel’s continued control of the West Bank. Haaretz (July 3, 2012).
New appeal by 17 residents of the West Bank settlement of Migron, due to be demolished next month, cite 2012 acquisition papers; Palestinian owner died in 2011. Residents of the condemned West Bank outpost of Migron have appealed the High Court to stay the demolition of the settlement’s illegal structures on Tuesday, claiming that they had recently purchased the land on which the homes were built. However, a preliminary inspection of the purported sale reveals that the Palestinian whom the settlers claim sold them the land passed away in 2011, one year before the alleged transaction. Citing what they said was their desire to keep the identity of the seller unknown, the 17 appellants, represented by Ze’ev Scharf, asked the High Court to submit the sale’s documentation in a sealed envelope. According to the appeal, the acquisition was conducted by the al-Watan development firm, which is owned by the Mateh Binyamin Development Company, who, in return, is owned by the Mateh Binyamin Regional Council in the West Bank. Al-Watan officials have claimed to have bought Miron’s lands in the past. However, a police investigation at the time revealed that the purchase was false, interrogating the firm's heads. The case was closed due to a lack of evidence. The appellants claim ownership over Miron’s lot 2 of block 7, as well as of lot 10 of block 26, who they said they purchased from "the registered owner in March 20, 2012." The owner of these lots is Yousif Musa ‘abdel Razek el-Nabut, who was part of the original 2006 High Court appeal against the outpost. However, Nabut died in 2011, making it impossible to sell his lands in March 2012. Ownership of the land has been passed on to his sons.

A report by a committee formed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to examine the legal aspects of West Bank land ownership rejects the claim that Israel’s presence in the territory is that of an occupying force and asserts that its settlements and settlement outposts there are legal. The Levy Committee, headed by former Supreme Court vice president Edmond Levy, recommends a fundamental change in the legal regime in the West Bank, including the annulment of a long list of laws, High Court of Justice Rulings and procedures in order to permit Jews to settle in all of Judea and Samaria. The report has been submitted to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who is considering how to respond. The committee was comprised of Levy, retired Tel Aviv District Court Judge Tchia Shapira, and attorney Alan Baker, an expert in international law. The committee was set up in January following pressure by settlement leaders to produce a legal report in response to the report submitted by Talia Sasson in 2005 on illegal outposts that had been commissioned by then Prime Minister.
Ariel Sharon. The convening of the Levy Committee came following a lengthy dispute between Netanyahu and Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein, who saw the convening of the committee as undermining his authority. In the end, the committee was convened as an advisory committee. It was also decided that all its recommendations would be accepted subject to Weinstein’s review and approval. A considerable portion of the Levy Report deals with refuting the conclusions of the Sasson Report, which dealt with construction from the 1990s and onward of neighborhoods and outposts on government land, with the encouragement of certain government elements but without building permits or official government approval. Haaretz (July 10, 2012).

- The Israeli government is stepping up construction in the West Bank settlements and acting to legitimize at least one illegal outpost it has pledged to demolish. The Israeli Defense Ministry recently contracted an architect to resume construction of the Givat Sal’it outpost in the Jordan Valley, in what is seen as a step toward legitimizing the outpost. Givat Sal’it is one of 26 communities the Sharon government had promised the United States it would tear down nearly 10 years ago. The resumption of construction seems to be part of a current trend in settlements. The Defense Ministry’s Civil Administration is due this week to discuss advancing plans for building 475 housing units in the West Bank settlements of Yakir, Oranit and Etz Efraim. This is in addition to the housing units approved in settlements in exchange for the quiet evacuation of the illegally-built Ulpana neighborhood in Beit El. Two weeks ago, the Defense Ministry, acting in coordination with the WZO, hired an architect to resume the Givat Sal’it expansion plans. Haaretz (July 17, 2012).

- The Israeli Ministerial Committee on settlement affairs decided to support a High Court petition by Migron residents to postpone the outpost’s evacuation, despite the State Prosecutor’s Office’s objection. The High Court of Justice ordered that Migron be evacuated by August 1 but recently residents claimed that they had purchased lands in the outpost and filed a motion to postpone the evacuation. This prompted a meeting of the Ministerial Committee headed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu during which it was decided to make it known to the court that the State requests more time to check the purchase claims. Migron residents said in response that the decision "restores common sense to the agenda contrasted by the Peace Now's hunger for destruction." The State has arranged the construction of permanent housing for the Migron families facing eviction in Psagot. The Migron residents, on their part, are motioning to register some of the lands on their names claiming they had purchased them. The ministers are therefore seeking to freeze the eviction of the houses in question until they check the purchase claims. An initial examination conducted by the Civil Administration confirmed the residents’ claims. Defense Minister Ehud Barak has also lent his support to holding an examination. However, the State Prosecutor’s Office is more concerned with implementing the High Court’s decision to evacuate the outpost first. The Ministerial Committee includes ministers Barak, Lieberman, Mofaz, Yishai, Ya’alon, Begin, Hershkovitz, Edelstein and Erdan. Ynetnews (July 17, 2012).

- Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz promised the Ariel University Center of Samaria NIS 50 million in special funding over the next two years. But that’s merely a fraction of the sum the college says it will need to complete its transformation into a full-fledged university. The treasury said the NIS 50 million figure was agreed upon following talks between the finance and education ministers and the Ariel institution. The ministry also said a detailed decision about the budget outline would be submitted for government approval once the transition to university status is completed. On July 17, 2012, the Judea and Samaria Council for Higher Education granted approval for the Ariel University Center to be upgraded. That decision must still be confirmed by the army commander in the West Bank. Although accreditation of the college as a university has been under consideration for months, no government body has estimated its future budget needs or explained how the state will fund them. The institution itself says it will need NIS 130 million annually on top of its current budget, which was NIS 100 million for the 2011-2012 academic year. But sources from the academic world estimated that the bill will be much higher - between NIS 200 million and NIS 400 million in upcoming years. They added that the institution’s financial needs will grow due to the anticipated increase in enrollment. The college currently has about 13,000 students. It would need a total of approximately NIS 230 million a year to function as a university, according to its own estimates. That figure puts it behind the budgets of the country’s seven existing universities. Haaretz (July 19, 2012)

- The state asked the High Court of Justice to delay by 29 days – from August 1 to August 30 – the eviction of the Migron outpost. It said that, based on security concerns, it did not want to evacuate the outpost during Ramadan, which began on July 20, 2012. It added that replacement homes had not been fully set up in the site by the Psagot winery, where the state plans to relocate the 50 families who live in Migron, on a small hilltop in the Binyamin region of the West Bank. The state presented both these positions at a special hearing on the outpost held on Sunday before three High Court justices in the capital. The court has ordered the state to evacuate Migron by August 1 because the modular homes there were built without permits on private Palestinian property. On July 22, 2012, the justices also listened to arguments with respect to a petition on behalf of Migron residents, which claims that a company has bought much of the land from the Palestinian owners on behalf of the settlers. During the hearing, the Attorney- General’s Office representative asked to wait until August 20 to present its position to the court, given that there was a disagreement between its office and the government with respect to this claim. JPost (July 22, 2012).

- Israeli government has secretly approved an additional NIS 7.6 million for the construction of a temporary site for Migron settlers, an affidavit submitted by the settlement division in the World Zionist Organization reveals. Including this sum, the total budget allocated for the construction has reached NIS 33 million - some NIS 730,000 per family. The affidavit was submitted to the High Court of Justice as part of another government request to postpone the evacuation of Migron. According to the High Court’s ruling, the illegal settlement was supposed to be evacuated by the end of March, but the state turned to the court and had requested to postpone the evacuation by three and half years, until a permanent site for the settlers would be prepared. The High Court rejected the state’s request, but agreed to postpone the evacuation until the end of July. Haaretz (July 23, 2012).

- Defense Minister Ehud Barak has ordered the demolition of eight Palestinian villages in the South Hebron Hills because the territory is needed for Israel Defense Forces training exercises, the state told the High Court of Justice. The residents of the targeted villages will be moved to the town of Yatta and its environs; most of these people have permanent homes in that area. The state will allow the residents to work their lands and graze their flocks there when the IDF is not training – on weekends and Jewish holidays – and during two other periods of one month each during the year. Barak agreed to leave four villages that are in the northernmost part of the area, even though this would reduce the dimensions of training area and prevent the use of live fire. The villages slated for demolition are the larger villages in the region: Majaz, Tabban, Sfai, Fakheit, Halaweih, Mirkez, Jinba, and Kharuba, which have a total of 1,500 residents. The villages to be spared are Tuba, Mufaqara, Sarura and Megheir al-Abeid, which have a total of 300 residents. The IDF and the Civil Administration regard all of them as squatters in Firing Zone 918, even though the villages have existed since at least the 1830s. Evacuation orders were issued against the 12 villages in 1999, but were frozen by an injunction issued by the High Court of Justice in response to two petitions that were united: One by attorney Shlomo Lecker and the second by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, who together represented some 200 families. An effort to reach an agreement on the status of the residents in the area by a mediation process failed in 2005. Haaretz (July 24, 2012).

- The Jerusalem municipality director-general has asked the IDF to take responsibility for handling civilian matters pertaining to Jerusalem residents east of the separation fence. The director-general, Yossi Heiman, made this request at a municipality meeting three weeks ago, saying the Israel Defense Forces’ Civil Administration could increase its responsibilities. The municipality wants the IDF to take responsibility for monitoring construction and providing sanitation services. The meeting concluded with a decision to form a committee that will present a plan to the government. Around 90,000 East Jerusalem residents live on the other side of the separation fence. After the fence started going up over a decade ago, a number of neighborhoods, including the Shoafat refugee camp and Kafr Aqab, morphed from Jerusalem neighborhoods into regions of anarchy lacking regular municipal services. Under agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, the Palestinian side, including its security services, is not allowed to operate in these areas, but the Israeli authorities also stay away due to security fears. Thus residents are ignored by Israel and the PA, and succumb to the whims and intimidation of local crime gangs. No police force operates in these areas, nor is there any monitoring of construction. As a result, in recent years, a number of large, half-built structures have sprung up in these areas. Garbage is not collected and roads are not repaired. For many weeks, a maternity hospital in Kafr Aqab has operated without telephone service, and these neighborhoods suffer dangerously from uncertain water supplies. Six months ago, Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat announced that areas on the other side of the fence should be put under the authority of the Civil Administration. In exchange, Barkat said, the municipality would provide services to residents who live west of the fence but who do not technically live in the Jerusalem municipality. Barkat said his policy recommendation would not require border adjustments; instead, municipality and civil administration officials would put together a plan to divide responsibility in providing services to residents on both sides of the fence. • Figures seen by Israel Hayom show 15,579 Israelis moved over the Green Line in the last year, 233,000 Israelis live outside the main settlement blocs. Number of settlers has almost doubled since 2000. Some 350,143 Israelis live in Judea and Samaria, according to figures from the Interior Ministry’s Population Administration that have been seen by Israel Hayom. This represents a 4.5 percent increase from last year and is the first time that number has gone beyond 350,000 people. This figure does not include Jerusalem neighborhoods that lie over the Green Line, such as Pisgat Zeev, Neveh Yaakov, Ramat Eshkol, Ramot, Armon Hanatziv (East Talpiot), Gilo and others where the Jewish population is an estimated 300,000. The figures show that 15,579 Israelis moved to Judea and Samaria over the last year, mostly to areas outside the main settlements blocs, areas which are not expected to remain under Israeli authority in the event of a peace agreement with the Palestinians. Ariel has close to 50,000 residents, while just over 45,000 live in Maaleh Adumim and 22,000 in the Etzion Bloc of settlements. In total, 116,824 Israelis live in the main settlement blocs, while more than 233,000 live outside the blocs. The figures show that the Jewish population in the Judea and Samaria has virtually doubled since 2000, when there were 190,206 Jews living over the Green Line. Israelhayom (July 26, 2012)

• Israel’s Defense Ministry said it would not allow five female students from Gaza to go to university in the West Bank. In May, Israel’s Supreme Court ordered the ministry to reconsider its refusal to allow the students to travel to the West Bank, after Israel admitted there were no individual security concerns about any of the students. On Thursday, Israel’s General Eitan Dangot said the students would not be allowed to travel because of "substantial political and security reasons". The five students -- four of whom are veteran women’s rights activists -- are enrolled to study gender studies, democracy and law programs at Birzeit University near Ramallah. There are no Master’s programs in gender studies or democracy in the Gaza Strip. Maannews & Al Quds (July 26, 2012).

• U.S. President Barack Obama announced that he will be releasing an additional $70 million in military assistance to Israel, a previously announced move that appeared timed to upstage Republican rival Mitt Romney’s trip to Jerusalem this weekend. The stepped-up U.S. aid, first announced in May, will go to help Israel expand production of the Iron Dome short-range rocket defense system. Obama made the announcement at the White House when he signed the U.S.-Israel Enhanced Security Cooperation Act, which is meant to approve and expands military cooperation between the two countries. Haaretz (July 27, 2012).

- Employees who quit their jobs in order to move to a settlement or outpost enjoy preferential benefits compared to those who quit moving anywhere else, according to a little-known article in the severance pay law. Attorney Shlomo Lecker discovered the clause while handling the cases of several Palestinians employed by the municipality of Ma‘aleh Adumim, a West Bank settlement. Employees are usually entitled to severance pay only if they are fired, not if they quit. But the law includes an exception for certain workers who quit because they are leaving town. As a rule, such workers are entitled to severance pay only if they are moving for one of a list of specified purposes - for instance, due to a marriage or divorce. But even then, they must move at least 40 kilometers from their workplace to qualify. Under Article 8 of the severance pay law, however, none of these conditions apply to workers who move to the settlements. "If a worker relocates his residence to a settlement or outpost authorized for this purpose by the defense minister and the agriculture minister, it is enough for the resigning employee to live in the place for six months [to qualify for severance pay]," regardless of why he is moving or how far his new home is from his workplace. The only other exceptions to the 40-kilometer rule are for workers who move from an ordinary urban or rural community to a development town or an agricultural community. For municipal workers, the law lays down slightly tougher rules. For people moving to a settlement: To qualify for severance pay, the worker must live in the settlement for at least a year and present documentation to prove that it is his permanent home. But that law doesn’t include the requirement that the settlement be approved by the defense minister - meaning even illegal outposts would theoretically qualify. Haaretz (July 27, 2012)

- Israel allocates 70 times more water to each settler than to the average Palestinian in the West Bank. Palestinians received 105 million cubic meters of water, less than the amount allocated in the 1995 Oslo Accords and around a quarter of the 400 million cubic meters needed according to international standards. Israel controls most of the water resources in the West Bank and refuses to increase the amount of water it allocates to Palestinians. Meanwhile in Gaza, 95 percent of the water is not fit for human consumption, and sea water -- contaminated with sewage -- is leaking into the over-extracted coastal basin, threatening long-term problems of kidney disease. PWA (July 31, 2012).

- Israel’s High Court ordered the Israeli state to find a solution for residents of a West Bank village threatened with demolition. Israel Civil Administration ordered the demolition of Zanuta, south of Hebron, in 2007, because structures in the village were built without permits. The Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which filed a joint petition to the court with Zanuta residents, says villagers could not have received permits because the Israeli government had no "master plan" for the village which is inhabited by 39 families live in the village. Judge Hanan Meltzer said it was the role of the military governor to find a solution for residents before demolishing the village. "It is advisable to think in advance where they will go, not afterward," the judge said, ruling that the state must present a plan for villagers within 30 days. Haaretz (July 31, 2012).

- The Israeli government spent NIS 1.1 billion on West Bank settlements last year, and could save at least that much if it were to make its spending proportionate to the number of Israelis who live in the settlements. Last year’s government spending on the settlements represents a 38 percent rise over that of 2010. But it is significantly lower than the peak of NIS 2.5 billion (in real terms) in 1993, when the funds were geared toward infrastructure changes required by the Oslo Accords. The report was prepared for U.S. officials to enable them to deduct the annual settlement expenditure from U.S. loan guarantees to Israel. In 2003 Israel stopped granting tax breaks to citizens seeking to move to the West Bank, after pledging to the United States that it would bring the benefits to an end. In the second report, which also examines the cost of the settlements and is scheduled to be released to the public on Wednesday, Peace Now states that Israel could save NIS 1.6 billion a year if it were to match the level of government expenditure on services such as education and infrastructure in the settlements with the number of people who live there. "If the government would just make per capita spending for residents of the settlements equal to spending for the rest of the country’s citizens, we would be able to cancel the widespread [budget] cuts and significantly reduce tax increases," said Peace Now head Yariv Oppenheimer. Haaretz (July 31, 2012)
