- The Israeli Defense Force (IDF) said the site, which is south of Nablus, is 'on the seam between Areas B and C.' Area C is under complete Israeli security and civilian control. Defense Forces demolished an encampment set up by Palestinians near the West Bank village of Burin over the weekend even though the Civil Administration says the army is not authorized to operate there. Before the demolition, the Civil Administration informed the IDF that it was not authorized to take action because the land is in Area B, which is under Palestinian civilian control. The IDF said the site, which is south of Nablus, is “on the seam between Areas B and C.” Area C is under complete Israeli security and civilian control. Palestinians set up the encampment on the 2nd of February 2013, bringing tents and a tin structure to a parcel of land that belongs to Burin and has been the site of multiple clashes between Burin residents and settlers from the nearby outpost of Givat Ronen. Clashes began anew shortly after the Burin residents set up the encampment, which they are calling Al-Manatir, and Border Police forces under the command of Lt. Col. Oriya Hetzroni had trouble getting the situation under control. The army also issued an order declaring the area a closed military zone, in an effort to prevent others from arriving to intensify the fighting. An officer from the Civil Administration, which is responsible for enforcing building and planning laws, was present and said that since the structures were erected in Area B, only the Palestinian Authority has the right to enforce civil law such as that governing illegal construction. Hetzroni ordered the encampment demolished anyway and the soldiers began to break up the tents with their hands. Residents of the nearby Jewish outpost made off with the tin structure. - Changes in Jerusalem police brass bring crackdown on Palestinian citizens. Operations included numerous arrests, roadblocks to inspect vehicles, tax collection, house demolitions, shutting off water, various fines, searches and random checks of identification, and more. Changes at the top of the Jerusalem District police are being felt in the eastern part of the capital. Palestinian residents in East Jerusalem have complained that the police, under new district commander Maj. Gen. Yossi Prienti, have been implementing an almost declared policy of collective punishment against neighborhoods considered too disruptive. Two weeks ago such an enforcement/punishment operation ended in Issawiya in north Jerusalem, and a week ago a new operation started in Silwan. The operations included numerous arrests, roadblocks to inspect vehicles, tax collection, house demolitions, shutting off water, various fines, searches and random checks of identification, and more. • A report issued by the Palestinian and Israeli human rights centres, reveal more than 20,000 children in Jerusalem unable to live with their families in Jerusalem city, the number of Palestinians who have been pulled right of permanent residence in Jerusalem has been raised, and this comes within the framework of the Israeli policy of judaizing the city of Jerusalem. Israel did not hide their concern to return Jerusalem city to reverse within the municipal boundaries of Jerusalem and artificial, contrary to their policy of “ethnic cleansing” in Jerusalem, which resulted in the loss of approximately 20,000 Palestinians their right of residence in the city due to the Israeli Government’s requirement of residence within artificial borders. the Israeli occupation authorities are continuing through ”the Israeli Ministry of the Interior “the identities of Jerusalemites and the abolition of the right of residence for more than 4,577 Jerusalemite during the last year, stressing that successive Israeli Governments pursued policies of racism against Palestinian Jerusalemites of residency requirements imposed by them, after the Israeli Supreme Court decision in 1988 that the continuity of the right to permanent residence is conditional on actual residence is within the green line of” Jerusalem “, and thus the Palestinian Jerusalemites burden Prove it, and the walls that these conditions do not apply to the inhabitants of Jerusalem from the Jews. the Jerusalemite to double discrimination on the right of abode as Palestinians and women, on the one hand, you lose the right to reside in Jerusalem, when her marriage to non-residents of Jerusalem, inside the green line and Palestinian Jerusalem have transferred their residence to their children, and children of Palestinian residents of Jerusalem to multiple violations of their rights from their identity [article 8 of the International Convention on the rights of the child]), and the consequent denial of other rights. This Israeli policy is followed explicitly contradict with a temporary occupation of the occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem, where the occupying power may not expel indigenous civilian population from their populations, while allowing Israel to invading housing settlers in occupied Jerusalem and leave and stay abroad and return to them at any time they please, without losing their right to citizenship, the Palestinian Jerusalemites who leave vulnerable to drag their identities and citizenship for them at the time determined by the Israeli Ministry of the Interior. The Environmental Protection Ministry has instructed the Betar Illit municipality in the West Bank to stop the repeated sewage contamination of a nearby Palestinian village’s fields, after a group of settlers interceded on the villagers’ behalf. Last week, farmers from the Palestinian village of Wadi Fukin asked the staff of the field school in the West Bank settlement of Kfar Etzion for their help in stopping the sewage flow from Betar Illit, which had flooded their fields and contaminated them. Members of the school’s staff came to the village and photographed the sewage flooding the cultivated fields. (Haaretz 5 February 2013)

• Israel is causing grave injustice to dozens of old, poverty-stricken communities that make a living from herding and farming. The campaign of destruction in the northern Jordan Valley continued for a week. The campaign started in January 17 at 6:30 in the morning, when bulldozers and Jeeps with soldiers and representatives of the IDF’s Civil Administration in the West Bank removed 60 Palestinians, including 36 children, and destroyed 46 tents and improvised structures. Thirty-two emergency tents from the Red Cross and other humanitarian organizations given to the residents after the destruction were confiscated two days later. The soldiers checked every vehicle at the site to make sure none were carrying humanitarian goods, and the water in the tanks was poured out. The declared reason for the destruction is usually “military exercises.” In 2012, eight times the IDF ordered the 17 communities of shepherds and farmers to temporarily leave their tents for that reason. But despite the fact that firing ranges already make up 45.7 percent of the area of the Jordan Valley, this is not enough for Israel: 20 percent of the area was declared a nature reserve; hundreds of thousands of mines were laid in the area; 2,500 dunums (about 625 acres) that were farmed by Palestinians were confiscated for the separation barrier. In total, out of an area of 1.6 million dunums in the Jordan Valley, Israel has seized 1.25 million – some 77.5 percent – where Palestinians are forbidden to enter. All this comes at the same time that Israeli settlements in the very same region live in peace and quiet, and are not required to evacuate. The IDF and Civil Administration’s brutal activities, which in addition to the destruction of the camps also includes cruelty in everything connected with access to water, is part of the consistent implementation of a nationalist policy based on the desire to uproot entire Palestinian populations from Area C and transfer them to Area A. In its desire to cleanse strategic centers of the West Bank (South Hebron Hills, the Khan al-Ahmar area and northern Jordan Valley) of Palestinian residents, Israel is causing grave injustice to dozens of old, poverty-stricken communities that make a living from herding and farming. Except for the fact that this is a cruel and inhuman policy that stands in opposition to every democratic and civilized principle, this behavior prove that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu’s call to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to renew peace negotiations is nothing but a ploy. (Haaretz 5 February 2013)

- The Israel Defense Forces broke a pledge to the High Court of Justice, and has not removed two illegal fences around settlements, which prevent Palestinian farmers from reaching their land. The IDF had pledged to remove the fences by the end of 2012, but work has not yet begun and no forecast has been made as to when it might start. The IDF told the court it would take down the fences in response to two petitions filed in 2009 by Palestinians from the villages of Jaba and Silwad, who were represented by the human rights group Yesh Din and attorneys Michael Sfard and Shlomi Zacharia. According to the petitions, unauthorized fences had been built around the settlements of Adam and Ofra in the northern West Bank, which closed off access by Palestinian farmers to their land. The state did not extensively dispute the petitioners’ claim. However, the state requested that new fences be built before the existing ones were taken down. In May 2011, the state presented the following statement to the court: "As part of the background work to map the illegal fencing in the Binyamin area and after examining their legality, a draft has been prepared of a comprehensive operational demand with regard to the security of the settlements, intended to regulate the establishment of alternative security components in the hope of limiting damage to private property as much as possible."

Regarding a timetable, the state said that according to its assessment, "the establishment of the alternative security components would be carried out at the end of 2012, subject to completion of preparatory work, authorization and budget." The state told the court it had placed the work on the fences on high priority in a comprehensive plan prepared by the IDF's Judea and Samaria Division. Taking the declarations at face value, the High Court canceled the petitions. In the matter of Silwad, Justice Elyakim Rubinstein wrote in September 2011: "In light of the progress in the work and its expected duration until the end of 2012, the solution proposed...seems sufficient." In October 2011, Justice Eliezer Rivlin rejected the petition of residents of Jaba, noting that there was "no reason for the court to intervene," but that "it would be proper to consider the possibility of speeding up the completion of the work in a shorter period than has been proposed. I have learned that as of now the work has not begun due to the process of issuing a tender. These administrative processes can certainly be expedited." Haaretz has learned that the IDF completed its preparatory work and passed the project on to the Defense Ministry for approval of funding, and the request has not gone through. However, the IDF never informed the High Court that it would be unable to meet the timetable. (Haaretz 7 February 2013)

- Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu has not changed his position on settlements; Israel Radio quoted an official in his office. The comment comes in the wake of a report that Netanyahu's senior security adviser said settlements impede Western support of Israel. According to Haaretz, National Security Council head Yaakov Amidror recently told closed-door meetings at the Prime Minister's Bureau that Israel's insistence on continuing settlement construction is costing it international support even among its most stalwart friends. "It's impossible to explain the issue of settlement construction anyplace in the world," Amidror was quoted as saying. "It's impossible to explain this matter to German Chancellor Angela Merkel or even to Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. Construction in the settlements has become a diplomatic problem and is causing Israel to lose support even among its friends in the West," Haaretz quoted Amidror as saying at a closed discussion. Amidror, a religious former head of research in Military Intelligence, has long been associated with the right. He recently told Israeli ambassadors serving abroad after who expressed concern about Israeli settlement construction in E1 that they should either represent Israel’s position, resign or go into politics. (JPOST 8 February 2013)

- Former foreign minister Avigdor Liberman said that an agreement with the Palestinians was not currently possible, weeks before US President Barack Obama’s upcoming trip to Israel. Liberman said it was not realistic to think it possible in this environment to reach a comprehensive peace accord with the Palestinians. “Anyone who thinks that in the center of the diplomatic, political and social tsunami that is shaking the Arab world it is possible to get a magical solution of comprehensive peace with the Palestinians does not understand,” he said. “I am saying clearly that it is impossible to reach a comprehensive agreement with the Palestinians,” said Liberman, who has not hidden his desire to return to the helm at the Foreign Ministry after his upcoming trial. “It is impossible to solve the conflict, it needs to be managed.” … Liberman said he was in favor of negotiations with the Palestinians “at any time and in any place in the world, without preconditions.” However, he said those negotiations should be over “a long term interim agreement.” Whether or not negotiations will be held, he said, rested with the Palestinians. - Permits to be issued for new units as part of compensation plan for the evacuation of the Ulpana outpost. The building of 90 new housing units in the Beit El settlement is underway. The Israeli Civil Administration in the West Bank removed the final obstacle and issued a statement of validation for the construction. Within a few weeks, permits were set to be issued for the 90 new units, as part of a compensation plan for the evacuation of the Ulpana outpost agreed upon eight months ago. The Yesha Council responded to the move, saying that they welcome any development in the West Bank. Conversely, Peace Now Secretary-General Yariv Oppenheimer said that the development is likely to cast a shadow over US President Barack Obama’s upcoming visit. He described it as a "mistaken and ill-timed decision." (JPOST 11 February 2013)

- At the request of the Israeli Municipality of Jerusalem, the Israeli central court in Jerusalem held a meeting to issue an order to commence the demolition of the 88 houses comprising Al Bustan neighborhood in Silwan town in Jerusalem city, and to cancel the grace period given to Palestinians which postpones the demolition of the houses until June 2013. This meeting was held to advance the implementation of the biblical garden plan. The final order of the case will be issued in 10 days. (Al-Quds 12 February 2013).

- The Israeli local committee for planning and building will hold a meeting on the 13th of February 2013 to discuss the issuance of nine military orders that will target 81 dunums of Palestinian lands in Beit Hanina town for the construction of one segment of the Israeli bypass road No. 21, along the Israeli Industrial settlement, Atarot. It's worth mentioning that the Israeli Municipality of Jerusalem and the Israeli company 'Moriah' have started to construct the road on al Sahel lands in Shu'fat town adjacent to Beit Hanina town. This road will mainly serve Ramat Shlomo settlement which Israel plans to expand it through the building of 1500 new housing units. (PNN 12 February 2013)

- The Israeli District Court in Jerusalem, rejected the petition of residents of Beit Safafa town against the road crossing the village. Unlike the Jewish neighborhoods road passes near them, the Beit Safafa is a cross of two and is very burden on the lives of residents. Two months ago, some residents filed an administrative petition against the city, claiming that the road building permits were issued illegally. According to the residents, represented friend Mr. Keyes was arrested, the road construction program, approved in 1990, does not include the detailed design of the road and were not given an opportunity to object or to receive compensation for the harm their quality of life. The judge rejected all the claims of the residents and determined the permits were legally and residents had to resist the original program 23 years ago. The judge also rejected Nasser's comparison between the plans submitted to the road near Jewish neighborhoods plan submitted section of the road in Safafa. By comparison, the program section of the Safafa is the only one that does not include appendices and conditions. "Every program and circumstances, any program on the date approved. As the program meets the requirements of the law, the fact that other programs include instructions and appendices are not included in the present program does not, by itself, negate the validity and legality," the judge wrote. - West Bank settlement outpost’s newest attraction: an airstrip. So far at least, the dubious legality of the makeshift runway near the settlement of Itamar doesn’t seem to be bothering residents or law enforcement authorities. The West Bank settlement outposts are not necessarily the barebones trailer-scattered hilltops many may envision. Some of them boast bed and breakfasts, vineyards – and now, for the first time, an airstrip. So far at least, the dubious legality of the makeshift runway doesn’t seem to be bothering either the residents or the law enforcement authorities. The airstrip, located on the Alumot outpost near the settlement of Itamar, is the brainchild of Yedidya Meshulami, who helped found it after moving to the area in 1996. Meshulami, who comes from a well-known family in religious Zionist circles, served in the Israel Air Force and is a trained military helicopter pilot. Alumot, which is also known as Givat Hatayas (meaning "The Pilot's Hill"), was built partly on state land allocated to the World Zionist Organization and partly on Palestinian land, according to a government report on the settlements. Meshulami has a herd of goats on the outpost, which he uses to make hard cheeses for sale. A few months ago he decided to make a "connection between the heavens and the earth," as he put it, and prepare a runway on his own, with the help of a tractor. Last week he started working on the hangar where he plans to store the secondhand ultra-light plane he bought for NIS 80,000, which he already uses periodically to fly around the West Bank. The problem is that ultra-light planes are banned in the West Bank, since IAF regulations state that planes must fly at an altitude of at least 8,000 feet in the area – too high for the ultra-lights. So far, though, the IAF has been silent on the matter. Within the Green Line, Israelis need a permit to build an airstrip, but the Israel Airports Authority doesn't operate in the West Bank. It's not surprising that the hilltops surrounding Itamar would be the source of the action, since over the last few years they have become what some call the Wild West of the settlements. Unlike on many other outposts, there is no organized leadership to speak of there, and the Civil Administration has all but given up efforts to enforce the law. Asked for its response to the airstrip, the Civil Administration would say only: "The issue is being handled. (Haaretz 12 February 2013)

- 'No place in Israel for Palestine,' says Naftali Bennett in maiden Knesset speech Bennett also refers to his commitment to making Israel's defense burden more equitable. In his first address to the Knesset, Habayit Hayehudi leader Naftali Bennett rejected any possibility of an agreement that would lead to the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. "There's no place in our small and stunning piece of God's country for another state," he said. "It won't happen. But friends, before any debate about territory, it must be said: The Land of Israel belongs to the people of Israel. Now let's argue." Bennett also referred to his commitment to making the defense burden more equitable. "My Haredi brothers, army service is also a mitzvah, no less than that," he said. "It cannot be that they [the Haredim] won't serve in the army. It cannot be that they won’t bear the economic burden. This is clear to the Haredim as well." Bennett called on the new MKs to band together to advance their common goals. "For the first time there are 47 new MKs, a record number, creating a special mix of elected officials who are not tied to a long list of obligations to vote contractors, tycoons, or unions or to any conceptual fixations. We can create partnerships that were thought in the past to be impossible, so we can bring the Jewish people achievements that until now seemed impossible." (Haaretz 13 February 2013)

- The number of Israeli settlers in the occupied West Bank grew by 4.7% in 2012, according to figures obtained by Yesha settlement council, the largest organization of West Bank settlers. The settler population stood at 360,000 at beginning of January 2013 compared to 343,000 in January 2012. The council indicated that since Israel pulled its settlers out of the Gaza Strip in 2005, population growth in the West Bank settlements averaged five percent annually, about three times that of the overall Israeli population. The council attributed the growth spurt to the fact that more people are moving to existing settlements and to a high birth rate among religious settlers. "We are pleased with these figures and expect the Israeli government to understand the need to develop settlements throughout "Judaea and Samaria" (the Biblical name for the West Bank)," council chairman Avi Roeh said. The two largest settlements are Modi'in Ilit, a community of ultra-Orthodox Jews west of the West Bank city of Ramallah, with 58,000 inhabitants, and Betar Ilit, an ultra-Orthodox settlement west of Bethlehem, with 44,000. Ma'ale Adumim, east of Jerusalem, is in third position with 39,000 inhabitants. These figures do not include some 200,000 Israelis in a dozen settlements of east Jerusalem, annexed by Israel in the 1967. Settlers represent 4.4 percent of the total population of Israel, which stands at 7.9 million people. Yesha Council (February 14, 2013)

- Change in the law allowed Israel to stop 14 released from Shalit deal on minor offenses Detainees might want the rest of the original sentences of decades because of offenses such as illegal gathering on the basis of secret evidence collection. Since the signing of the deal to release Gilad Shalit in October 2011 IDF arrested 14 prisoners released in the deal. Five of them were sentenced to heavy prison terms in their time ranging from 24 to 38 years, and now they can go back and want the rest of the sentence - between 16 to 28 years. This is because in 2009, while negotiations for Shalit's release, changes were made in military legislation concerning the release of prisoners before after serving sentence (Order No. 1677 regarding Security). Changes and the interpretation given today Order allow IDF and Shin Bet back and stop any loose by the end of the original sentence because of offenses that do not constitute terrorist activity relying on secret evidence. The five detainees are Samer Issawi Issawi, now it's 210 days on the water, salts and food additives only, Ayman Brown Dura, fasting with short breaks is 140 days, and Ibrahim Abu Hajleh, Iyad Abu Fanon and Ayman Abu Daoud. Other detainees, including a minor and a woman, were sentenced to short prison terms in the first place and they care less attention Palestinian public opinion. Issawi and Brown with a hunger strike two other administrative detainees, Tarek Jafar Kaadan Iz a - law. The four successful these days stir among Palestinians more than any other friction generated under Israeli control. Concern for the fate and angry families that are not allowed to visit them pushed aside the substantive discussion of the Shalit deal. (Haaretz 17 February 2013)

- Israeli Cabinet secretary Hauser announces plan to invest NIS 700 million into developing Jewish, Zionist historical sites. Three years after a cabinet decision to invest hundreds of millions of shekels to preserve and upgrade significant Jewish and Zionist historical sites sparked angry protest from the Palestinian Authority because a number of the sites were over the Green Line, some 296 projects are being developed, cabinet secretary Zvi Hauser said. Of the 296 projects in the NIS 700 million program, 13 percent deal with the biblical period; 16% with the Second Temple and Talmudic times; 12% with the Old Yishuv period, 18% with early waves of immigration; 15% with later waves of immigration; and 26% with the beginning of the state. Nine of 80 major projects are located in Judea and Samaria, and 16 others are in Jerusalem. Among those projects that drew Palestinian ire three years ago were initiatives in the capital’s City of David, the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron, Tel Shilo, Sussiya and the Herodian archeological site near Bethlehem. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas warned at the time that the program would spark a “religious war” and “third intifada.” Hauser said another project is in the works as part of the program – using a separate budget – that will involve an Einstein Museum on Hebrew University’s Mount Scopus campus, to house the writings Albert Einstein bequeathed to the university. In addition to large projects like the upgrade of Independence Hall in Tel Aviv and the restoration of the Montefiore Windmill in Jerusalem, the program is giving money to some 100 smaller projects around the country to upgrade them and make them more accessible to the public. These projects include Ben-Gurion’s hut in Sde Boker, Haifa’s city museum, the aliya museum in Zichron Palestinians reject Israel’s compromise for West Bank fence: Stop rail traffic instead of building on our land. Batir village residents reject state suggestion to build chain-link fence instead of wall on ancient terraces. Palestinian residents in the West Bank village of Batir have rejected a compromise proposed by Israel’s defense establishment on the construction of a particularly controversial section of the separation barrier that crosses over the ancient terraces in their community. In response to the villagers’ petition filed with the High Court of Justice, defense officials had suggested building a fence, rather than a wall, in that specific section. The Israeli officials say the compromise would minimize environmental damage to the area, but still provide the necessary security for an Israel Railway passenger line that passes through Batir. But the Palestinian petitioners in turn rejected the compromise, suggesting that the state consider temporarily suspending service on the Israel Railway passenger train to and from Jerusalem. In their rejection of the compromise last week, the Palestinian petitioners quoted landscape conservation experts who said that a fence would cause as much damage as a wall - both through direct damage to the terraces on which it would be built and by interrupting the contiguity of cultivated land. The conservation experts also pointed out that a barrier would curtail the villagers’ access to their fields on the Israeli side, even if security checks were rapid and passage convenient. The original High Court petition was filed by Batir residents with support from Friends of the Earth Middle East and a number of Israeli citizens, after it emerged that the defense establishment was planning to build a high stone wall, 500 meters in length, near the village. The state responded to the High Court petition by offering its compromise, claiming a chain-link fence would balance Israeli security needs with landscape conservation. “The change involves taking a security risk because a chain-link fence is less effective than a wall, mainly in [protecting against] gunfire or the placement of explosive devices,” the state told the High Court. But a fence would minimize ecological damage while increasing a sense of contiguity between the village and its fields, some of which will be on the other side of it, the state added. Defense officials have said that neither a fence nor a wall would impair the ability of Batir’s villagers to irrigate their cultivated terraces in the traditional way. The state also said in its response to the petition that convenient passage would be created through a gated checkpoint under the fence to enable Batir’s farmers to work their fields. Under these circumstances, the villagers would have “eye and voice contact that would significantly contribute to the sense of contiguity” between the two sides of the fence, the state said. The defense establishment stressed to the court that the barrier was necessary for security. The railway tracks are just eight meters from Batir’s school, the state pointed out. However, it emphasized to the court, “the threat from this close proximity is not necessarily from the residents of Batir, but from anyone who would take advantage of the proximity to the railroad.” Noting that the state considers security of the railway line a key reason for building the barrier, the petitioners suggested suspending its operation in the area, especially, they wrote, “as this line is not used as a means of mass transit but as a tourist train.” Since a new Jerusalem-Tel Aviv rail route is scheduled to begin operation within four or five years, the petitioners said, some compromise on train travel would still be needed to protect the site from ecological damage. - Israel to return West Bank farmland to Palestinian owners after wrongly allocating land to kibbutz. Over the years, Israel, under various pretexts, has seized control of around 20,000 dunums of privately owned Palestinian land and transferred it to settlements for agricultural use. Israel is slated to return some 1,200 dunums (300 acres) of farmland in the northern Jordan Valley to its Palestinian owners, following the Israel Lands Administration’s admission it had mistakenly assigned the land to Kibbutz Merav, which is within the Green Line. The ILA admitted the 30-year-old error last week in a letter to attorney Tawfiq Jabarin, who is representing the landowners. But it turns out that already in January 2012, the ILA had informed the kibbutz of the problem and told kibbutz officials that the land was no longer theirs. Nevertheless, the kibbutz is still cultivating the land. The ILA has no authority in the areas captured in 1967, and certainly had no right to transfer privately owned Palestinian land – which was actually registered as such with the Israeli authorities – to a community in Israel proper. This is the only known case of such a mistake being made. Over the years, Israel, under various pretexts, has seized control of around 20,000 dunums of privately owned Palestinian land and transferred it to settlements for agricultural use. But in October 2011, Dror Etkes, who researches Israeli land takeover in the West Bank, discovered that this plot of land, located in what is called the Ka’oun plain, was being cultivated by a kibbutz within the Green Line, although its legal owners live in Bardala and Tubas, just south of the Green Line in what is legally the West Bank. Only in November 2011, after Akiva Eldar of Haaretz reported on the apparent error, did the ILA begin investigating the issue. Jabarin tried several times during 2012 to find out the results of the probe, but only received an answer from the ILA last week. “Kibbutz Merav was mistakenly allocated land that lies across the Green Line and whose ownership appears in our records under the status of ‘arrangement,’” the ILA wrote. “When the error was clarified ... kibbutz representatives were invited to a meeting in the district office and they were informed that the land was being taken from them. The land was removed from their allotted slot soon after the meeting, which took place in 2012.” Although a year has since passed, the kibbutz is still working the land. Ortal Tzabar, the ILA spokeswoman, confirmed that the kibbutz, which had been informed it should return the land to its owner, has yet to evacuate it. The ILA, she said, in coordination with the Agriculture Ministry, is looking for alternative land for the kibbutz. Tzabar had no idea why it took a year for Jabarin to be told what had transpired. “The ILA is going to make a concerted effort to wrap up this case in the near future,” she said. Upon contacting the kibbutz, Haaretz was referred to Ron Ben-Nun, who declined to say what his official position was. Neither did he confirm that the ILA had informed the kibbutz a year ago that it was farming Palestinian land. Later in the conversation, however, he admitted that “it was brought to our attention that others have claims to the land, if I may put it delicately. They aren’t claims against us. “The ILA allocated this land to us and if the ILA wants to take land away, it knows how to do it,” Ben-Nun continued. “All these years we’ve been using this land that was allocated to us, including now. We are cultivating it as usual, why not?” Asked if the kibbutz was waiting to be allocated alternative land, he replied, “I don’t know what will be in the future.” He added that the kibbutz was not the address for clarifying the matter. “If there are complaints about anyone, they’re not about us. We’ll be happy if it’s written that Kibbutz Merav is not the problematic party here.” (Haaretz 18 February 2013)

- State harassing us because we’re protesting new road, say Palestinian villagers. Tax raids, fines and arrests are just some of the means by which the state hopes to quell the swell against the road bisecting Beit Safafa; police-city denies collective punishment. Since they began protesting against a main traffic artery being built smack through their neighborhood, say the inhabitants of Beit Safafa, police and other authorities have been abusing them. They suspect the authorities of trying to break them using means they would never apply in a Jewish neighborhood. Beit Safafa is a neighborhood in Jerusalem, partially located inside the Green Line (the 1948 armistice line). It is more like a village than a neighborhood per se, and is considered to be the Palestinian area most open to Jews in all of Jerusalem. But the road under construction is splitting the neighborhood into two, in some cases mere meters from homes. The alleged harassment is multi-pronged. Beit Safafa business owners say the income tax authorities have suddenly stepped up raids, for instance. “Three tax squads have been going around the village, accompanied by police. They reached us at 9:00 the evening and they didn’t find anything. One told us, ‘We will keep coming and getting in your way until the demonstrations stop,’” relates Ahmad Al’ayan, who works at a Beit Safafa grocery. On Tuesday Jerusalem municipality inspectors also showed up. They handed out fines for “construction without permits” – for edifices, including a canopy for instance, that had been there for ten or 15 years. Last week three Beit Safafa residents were arrested. Abdelakrim Lafi, 55, chairman of the village parents’ committee, was detained and taken for questioning at 2:00 A.M. on suspicion of helping to organize a strike at the school in protest against the road. The police confiscated the computers and mobile telephones in his home, and released him after 15 hours. The police explain that Lafi’s conduct “could disturb the public order.” “I told the investigators that according to an Education Ministry bulletin, it is permissible to organize a strike at a school over things that interfere with studies,” says Lafi. "In this case we went on strike because this is something that affects the students’ lives, not just their studies.” Two days Lafi’s arrest, two other inhabitants were arrested and spent a night in jail. They were arrested by policemen in civilian dress (though the Jerusalem Police deny they were so-called "mista’aravim" – undercover police disguised as Arabs) who infiltrated a demonstration by inhabitants with the participation of Ahmed Tibi (United Arab List-Ta’al). There are conflicting versions as to who attacked whom during the demonstration. The inhabitants say they believed the undercover policemen were contract workers who were carrying out the works in the village and had been sent to bust up the demonstration. They police, however, say the policemen were attacked by residents. (Haaretz 20 February 2013)

- IDF preventing building or development on almost 4,700 dunams of land on the Palestinian side of the barrier for security reasons. Israel is preventing development in Palestinian lands adjacent to the separation barrier, despite these areas being under Palestinian civilian control according to the Oslo Accords. Although the peace process based on these accords is in a stalemate, Israel is using several clauses in the accords to issue decrees preventing development as well as seizure decrees affecting thousands of dunums, according to Dror Etkes, who researches Israeli takeover of land in the West Bank. Israel claims that the Palestinian Authority enjoys almost complete control of its affairs - the PA has civilian and military control over 18 percent of the West Bank (Area A), and civilian control in 22 percent of the West Bank (Area B), but exploits the clauses in the accords that state that when necessary it can apply security measures in these areas. In addition to urgent cases - such as arresting wanted Palestinians in Areas A and B - the Defense Ministry uses its authority in these areas in other ways as well. A striking example is Israel’s policy towards the lands bordering the separation barrier. The IDF is preventing building or development in almost 4,700 dunums of land on the Palestinian side of the barrier (in Areas A and B), for security reasons. On the one hand, Israel maintains that the Palestinian enjoy semi-independence in the areas under their civilian control, but at the same time it issues military decrees in these areas. In addition, there are also 1,870 dunums in Areas A and B that are subject to confiscation for the construction of roads following the erection of the separation barrier. The result of these two moves is a significant limitation on the use that Palestinians can make of areas received in the Oslo Accord. The Defense Ministry says, in response, that the decrees issued concerning these lands are legal and have been approved by the High Court of Justice. Construction bans were issued on areas on the eastern, Palestinian, side of the separation barrier, preventing building between 100 and 250 meters from the fence. In 2011, 71 such bans were renewed in Area B, and four more in Area A, in all, comprising 3,950 dunums. The decrees also limit building in several Palestinian towns and neighborhoods in Area A, such as Anata, Dahiat Al-Barid in north Jerusalem, Abu Dis south of Jerusalem, and Beit Sahour in the Bethlehem area. In Anata, the Civil Administration issued a demolition order this month against several houses built near the fence. Regarding bans on building near the separation barrier, a security source told Haaretz that the High Court of Justice has approved such decrees in two rulings in the mid-2000’s. The source explained that the IDF prevents building on both sides of the fence in the 500-kilometer route of the fence, except in places where the fence was built in already constructed areas. The source said that the bans were meant to prevent effective use of light weapons against IDF patrols near the fence, to make it harder to plant explosives or to place observation posts. Most of the second forms of decrees, the confiscation decrees, were issued after the Oslo Accord, and concern land in Areas A and B. In all, some 115 confiscation decrees were issued, 99 concerning Area B and 16 concerning land in Area A. Most of the decrees address lands adjacent to the fence and are used for the road system built around the fence. Some of these roads are alternative roads, paved for use by the Palestinians, after the fence made the use of other roads impossible. A Defense Ministry spokesperson said that most of the confiscation decrees were issued in Area C and in Israel, and only a minority of the decrees affected Area B, and that the High Court of Justice approved such actions. Etkes, who gathered the information concerning the decrees responded by saying that "Israel insists that the PA is semi-independent, and says it hopes to negotiate with it. But when this sweet story conflicts with other interests, Israel is well aware that in fact this is occupied area which can be directly controlled by military decrees, without the mediation of the PA leadership in Ramallah."
