- A bit over a year, a petition to the High Court of Justice claiming that land belonging to Abd Al Khader Qabaha in the northern West Bank had been given to a Civil Administration officer from the settlement of Reihan. In court, the state argued that the land was registered as state land back in the days of Jordanian rule. On October 3, 2012. An envelope from the Israeli State Prosecutor's Office arrived at the office of attorney Tawfiq Jabareen, Qabaha's lawyer. It contained three documents, including two copies of a document listing the British Mandate's high commissioner as the land's owner. The other document was the registry form for the plot. The documents showed that under the rubric "Land Located in the Area of the Jenin Land Registry Office" that in July 1974 (that is, seven years after the Jordanians left the West Bank) the land had been registered under the name "the State of Israel." And that's not all. On the form is a stamp dated August 29, 2011, from the land registry in Be'er Sheva. Former Israeli officers in the Civil Administration who have seen the documents were equally surprised. For the first time they realized that the State of Israel registers in its name a plot that is not a part of the State of Israel. (The declaration "state land" only lets the state use the land. It does not mean it owns the land). Haaretz (October 10, 2012)

- Roughly a month ago, infrastructure work began in one of the house-trailer neighborhoods in the West Bank settlement of Ofra. Brown soil was needed to cover the foundations. In properly functioning places, such soil is bought and paid for, but not in Ofra. Tzvi, a local farmer, nicknamed "Kishu," found an alternative: He sent a rented tractor and truck to the outskirts of the settlement, next to the Palestinian villages of Silwad and Deir Dibwan, where they simply stole dirt. Tzvi claims that the land belongs to him. The theft was made possible – even easy – by the fact that wide expanses of land belonging to Deir Dibwan and Silwad are enclosed within Ofra's security fence, and the villages' residents do not have free access to their own fields. Entry into Ofra requires coordination with the Israel Defense Forces and a constant security escort. The fence, like many parts of Ofra, was built without any permits. - Netanyahu reportedly plans to bring Levy Committee recommendations on settlement construction for ministerial approval; The Prime Minister's plan comes just days after dissolving the Knesset. The Levy Report, published three months ago by retired Supreme Court justice Edmond Levy, found that Israeli settlement in the West Bank is legal under international law and recommended that the government avoid demolishing illegal outposts. Israel Radio reported that Netanyahu plans to bring portions of the report to the Ministerial

Committee for Settlements for approval. Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz (Likud) told Israel Radio that adopting the report could help regularize and normalize life in the West Bank settlements. Netanyahu plans to modify the legal procedures that delayed building in Judea and Samaria up to this point, while avoiding "international legal landmines" that could be met with difficulties with the Supreme Court and with the International Court of Justice, according to Israel Radio. In July, Netanyahu praised the Levy Committee for its serious work, saying the report "addresses the question of the legality and legitimacy of the settlements in Judea and Samaria on the basis of facts and claims that must be seriously examined." - The Israeli State promised to build 90 new homes in nearby Beit El settlement under agreement approved by Defense Minister Ehud Barak in August 2012. It is currently being processed by the Israeli Civil Administration. The senior government officials promised to promote the construction of 90 new housing units in the West Bank settlement of Beit El in return for the quiet evacuation of the nearby Ulpana outpost. Melamed (director of Sukkat Avodah, a voluntary association) and Erdan agreed to significantly enlarge the yeshiva complex, adding more housing and public buildings. Five buildings are to be built on a 2.5-acre plot in the center of Beit El. Sixteen of these apartments have already been constructed and are termed "faculty quarters," to be made available to faculty members and others connected to the yeshiva. The land is owned by Sukkat Avodah and is headed by Yoel Tsur, Melamed's right-hand man, who also heads the Company for Developing Beit El's Yeshiva Complex. Some of these 90 units were supposed to be constructed by rebuilding demolished Ulpana structures, but Beit El council say this is not a viable option, apart from possibly integrating some of the old walls into the structures. The necessary infrastructure will be paid for by the Defense Ministry.

- Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu paid a visit to the illegal settlement of Gilo in a defiant prelude to talks with the European Union's top diplomat, who has condemned Gilo's expansion. Israel issued a detailed plan last week for 797 additional homes in Gilo settlement. "United Jerusalem is Israel's eternal capital, we have a full right to build in it," Netanyahu said during a tour of Gilo, a day before he was due to meet Catherine Ashton, the EU's high representative for foreign affairs. Ashton deeply regretted the planned expansion of Gilo, where some 40,000 Israelis live. "Settlements are illegal under international law and threaten to make a two-state solution impossible," she said, referring to more than two decades of efforts to negotiate the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. Israel captured East Jerusalem in 1967 and illegally annexed it in a move never recognized internationally. "We have built Jerusalem, we are building Jerusalem and we will continue to build Jerusalem. This is our policy and I will continue to back building in Jerusalem," Netanyahu said in Gilo. - A right-wing organization active in settling Jews in controversial parts of East Jerusalem, is providing the funds for excavations by Tel Aviv University archaeologists on a contentious site near the City of David. The excavations funded by the Elad organization have drawn the ire of Palestinian residents, as well as international and Israeli left-wing organizations. Some archaeologists say that the methodology – tunneling under village houses and the speed at which the excavations are to be performed – violates accepted professional norms. This is the first time a university has decided to formally take part project in such an excavation. The dig will be conducted by Tel Aviv University's Institute of Archaeology in coordination with the Israel Antiquities Authority, which will transfer funds from Elad to the university. According to an internal TAU memo, funding for project leader Yuval Gadot's salary will be transferred from the Antiquities Authority to the university. The Antiquities Authority will also fund TAU's analysis of the findings. Elad (a Hebrew acronym for El Ir David, "To the City of David") has served as administrator of the City of David on behalf of the Nature and Parks Authority since the late 1990s; separately, it has been active in purchasing structures and setting up Jewish settlements in East Jerusalem. According to the left-wing Emek Shaveh, Elad's declared purpose is "the creation of a contiguous Jewish presence along the southern slopes of the Temple Mount." The decision of the archaeology institute to participate in the project has been brought to the attention of the TAU heads; the final draft of the terms of the agreement between the university and the Antiquities Authority is due to be signed soon. The excavation plans envisions work in what is known as area E, in the lowest part of the park, adjacent to the El-Bustan neighborhood of Silwan, where the Jerusalem Municipality is planning to establish a park called "King's Garden." Critics question the role of Elad in the dig. Haaretz (October 26, 2012)
